THE OVENBIRD
[From the Chicago Evening Post]
Aristotle long long ago (look him up) saw a little bird with a golden crown of feathers on its head. He called it in Greek, of course, kinglet; and that name it bears to this day in Greece and in America; for we have the philosopher's "little king" with us in Illinois every spring and every autumn. Likely enough it is that Aristotle showed the kinglet to his pupil Alexander in order to force home to him the fact that there were other crowns in the world than those of human royalty.

What has all this to do with the ovenbird? Well, only this—that if Aristotle had seen the ovenbird with its golden crown he probably would have paid scant heed to the kinglet. Why? Because the ovenbird not only would have shown the cap piece of royalty, but would have flattered Aristotle by bursting into song the whole burden of which would have been "Teacher-teacher-teacher!" And, as even we moderns know, the philosopher was some teacher.

It was the golden crown of the ovenbird which first attracted the attention of the American country folk. They were not scientists, and, consequently, they did not know to what family the bird belonged. They gave it the fine but misleading name, golden-crowned thrush. The ovenbird is a warbler, not a thrush, but golden-crowned thrush it will be to those who love it and love its song and do not care a rap what its scientific kinship is. The ovenbird is nesting on the ground near the edges of our northern woods today. Its summer home is rooted and is open at the side. It is about as near rainproof as a bird's house can be. At this season the ovenbird is singing all day. Later it will become silent, but it sings enough in six weeks to do its full duty in the world of music. Teacher-teacher-teacher!" it sings, but even though the wording is that of John Burroughs, it does no justice to the song. The ovenbird is an ecstatic singer. Go out to hear him.
